Description
Since a publication cannot exist without a project—so that it follows Redmine's philosophy—I think publications we should create the publication's main project concept. One advantage of this behavior is that the link to a publication can always be created using that project's "environment". In the case of publications associated with a single project this will be the main one by default. In terms of rights, should the publication's main project be the only place where the publication can be edited? Any opinions?

I think this is probably a good idea -- we certainly need to have some editable context when we click on a publication from a neutral list (e.g. the overall publications page).
